

2019 ANZSEE conference @ RMIT University

Ecological Economics: Solutions Now and in the Future

The Australia New Zealand Society of Ecological Economics conference addresses the great challenge of our times: how we can live sustainably.

We have a great line-up of speakers and 18 panels with 50+ talks and Q&A for all.

KEYNOTES

Joshua Farley (University of Vermont, US) on the future of ecological economics
Jon Altman (Australian National University, Canberra) on indigenous ecological economics
Karrina Nolan (Original Power, Melbourne/NT) on Indigenous peoples' eco-programs
Ian Lowe (Griffith University, Queensland) on population growth, and more, in cities
Mike Berry (RMIT University, Melbourne) on urban economic challenges
David Spratt (Breakthrough National Centre for Climate Restoration) on climate change
Harriet O'Shae-Carre & Kaity Thompson (Students Strike 4 Climate) on climate action

We will launch Pluriverse: A Post-Development Dictionary at 3pm on the Monday.

Recently The Conversation posted a series of articles written by some of our keynote speakers – and others – in association with the ANZSEE 2019 ecological economics conference: Anitra Nelson & Brian Coffey introduce ecological economics and its significance today; Ian Lowe & Mike Berry argue that, 'No Australian city has a long-term vision for living sustainably. We can't go on like this'; Jon Altman reviews how genuinely ecological economies might achieve sustainable livelihoods for Indigenous people and contribute significantly to a sustainable economy; and, Wendy Steele & Michelle Maloney argue that nature needs a legal standing.
